How the Dishonest Journals of England Suppress the Royal

World London Letter It is a harsh, disagreeable, ungracious thing to say, but it is a fact that the Prince of Wales has lately been doing his best, or his worst, to injure himself in the estimation of those who are most anxious to respect him, and to preserve the monarchy. I state it mildly when I say that a feeling of intense annoyance and painful disgust prevails not only in the stricter religous circles of the kingdom, but even in the clubs and the coteries of fashionable society in consequence of the recent doings of the Prince. Since the 1st of May, as all the world knows. this weak and foolish young man has been enjoying an almost endless round of festivities at Vienna, Presth and Berlin. It was remarked with chargrin that during these fetes he acted more like a frivolous pleasure-seeker, to whom some new delight was a daily, almost an hourly necessity, than as a serious and sober-minded prince, heir to a great destiny. And it was remarked, with something more than chagrin, that so devoted was he to pleasure that he could not rest on Sunday, but employed the hours of that day in amusements which, to the average English and Scotch mind, are at best but tolerable on week-days and absolutely intolerable on Sundays. Little was openly said about this, however—the newspapers "burked" nost of the dispatches that told indiscreet tales-and what happens in Austria need not be generally known in Carpenter, J. McD. French, Elias England. But on last Sunday morn-George, J. D. Garrell, E. A. Hawes, ing the Prince arrived in Paris, on his way home. The Derby is to be run to-morrow, and of course the Prince would not miss that. Now, what happens in Paris is almost as if it happened in London. The two cities are only eleven hours apart; and Paris is always full of English people and of London newspaper correspondents.-

Now, when the Prince arrived there on Sunday morning, after three weeks of endless junketings, one might have expected that he would have been glad of a little quiet, and would have been willing to respect-outwardly, at least, the sanctity which attaches in the English eyes to the day of rest. Far from it. Almost immediately after his arrival at the Hotel Bristol-he had traveled all night-he drove out to the Bois de Boulogne, and breakfasted at the famous Cafe de la Cascade, a house near the race course, and the resort of the creme de la creme of fashionable Paris society, The breakfast was a 'stunning" one and took up much time: returning late to his hotel he received Lord Lyons, who dined with him; and then, as a nice way of spending a quiet Sunday evening, this future head of the English Church went to the "Varietes" theatre, where that redrive to the Bois de Boulogne, and after dinner he again went to the the-

But he was too busy in the Bois, at the cafe, and at the theatres to give any thought to politics. He made no visits to the new President or the deposed one, and tonight he arrived home in time for the Derby to-morrow. I can scarcely give you an adequate idea of the disgust and anger all this excites in the very quarters where "loyalty" is most fervent. Curiously enough, no publicity would have been given to the news of Wiggins, John H. Brown, David Mote.

In this instance, all the journals received a dispatch concerning the exand they all-with one exception -disereetly burked it. A junior sub-editor happened to be alone on duty in the Schr Frances Satterly, office of one of the papers. He had not been fully informed of the rules; he naturally thought it was his duty to get as much news as possible in his paper. When the Paris dispatch came he ordered a display head for it, and to the horror of his superiors the fatal news appeared this morning in big type. Thus the scandal could no longer be kept quiet; the clubs to-night are buzzing with it. One M. P. has avowed his intention of asking in Parliament "the disgraceful news" be true, and the Republicans are chuckling over the thought that Albert Edward has so soon and so completely destroyed all the popularity which he regained Ruins, Jonnasen, during his illness and immediately after his recovery.

What I have said about the Londor papers suppressing news reminds me something which I have often Registrars and Inspectors, Andrew thought of saying concerning the want

The movement has become a very serious one; the men engaged in it are already powerful, and they have a following-no always avowed-more numerous than even they themselves believe." "What will you say about it?" I asked .-"Oh," said he, "ridicule and laugh at it, of course. You don't suppose, my good fellow, that we can afford to tell the truth about such things, do you?" And so it was not only with his journal, but with all of them; one only publishing even a fair report of the Convention, and the others mutilating and almost falsifying the reports of their own correspondents, and asserting in their editorial columns that the Convention was a contemptible failure. many virtues and the savor of a good name be Again, within the last few days, another illustration of this kind of spectors—A. E. Taylor, John Newkirk, journalism has been furnished. Reute's J. R. Paddison, O. R.
